Crown with a Contemporary Pulse

Ronacher Theater, 04.11.2026 [ENA]

History offers musical theatre its most seductive challenge: to turn a public monument into a private human being. “Maria Theresia – Das Musical,” the Vereinigte Bühnen Wien production at the Ronacher, embraces that challenge with an ambitious combination of dynastic drama and contemporary musical language. The music was written by Dieter and Paul Falk, lyrics by Jonathan Zelter and a book by Thomas Kahry.

This work approaches its protagonist through power, passion and historical transformation. Its artistic proposition is immediately attractive: a woman framed by inherited expectations, yet determined to shape events herself. The production’s strongest conceptual asset is the tension between public authority and intimate identity. A ruler’s life can easily become a procession of ceremonial occasions, but musical theatre requires something more immediate: desires that collide, relationships that change and decisions that demand an emotional price. The published description places a forceful personality at its centre, suggesting an opportunity to explore not merely how authority is acquired, but how it alters the person who exercises it.

Such an approach invites a reading beyond straightforward celebration. A compelling portrait of leadership should allow determination and vulnerability to coexist without making either a decorative accessory. The dramatic question is not simply whether Maria Theresia can prevail. It is what prevailing means within a world where personal affection, family expectation and political necessity cannot remain neatly separated. That friction offers the material its richest theatrical possibilities.

Nienke Latten is listed in the title role, with Fabio Diso as Franz Stephan of Lorraine. Latten’s experience includes the central role in Vienna’s “Rebecca” and Princess Anna in the Dutch production of “Frozen”; Diso’s repertoire encompasses “Jekyll & Hyde,” “Chess” and “Chicago.” These backgrounds suggest performers familiar with the demands of combining psychological characterisation with sustained musical storytelling. Their effectiveness here must ultimately be judged in performance, but the casting provides substantial grounds for anticipation.

From a musical-theatre perspective, that distance can be productive. A contemporary pulse can make ambition feel urgent rather than remote, while a direct melodic statement can bring emotional experience closer to the audience. Yet the essential test is dramatic specificity. Music should do more than underline importance: it should reveal differences between people, expose contradictions and move a scene somewhere dialogue alone could not reach. The production's stated combination of scale and immediacy makes that relationship particularly worth listening for.

Jonathan Zelter's lyrics and Kahry's book carry the corresponding responsibility of connecting individual feeling to the wider narrative. Director Alex Balga oversees a work whose announced ambition is both spectacular and character-driven. The attraction lies in the possibility that these elements support one another: theatrical scale giving consequence to private choices, and private choices preventing the spectacle from becoming merely illustrative.

The surrounding cast broadens the dramatic field. Moritz Mausser appears as Friedrich II of Prussia, Annemieke van Dam as Madame Fuchs, Annemarie Lauretta as Elisabeth Christine and Andreas Wolfram as Chancellor Bartenstein. Arne Stephan takes the roles of Karl VI and Michael Gabriel Fredersdorff. This distribution places the central figure within a network of familial, political and personal relationships rather than leaving her isolated inside a star vehicle.

Ultimately, the most inviting quality of "Maria Theresia" is its ambition to make power emotionally legible. A running time of approximately two hours and fifty-five minutes, including an interval, allows considerable narrative scope; German-language performance with English surtitles also opens that narrative to international audiences. Whether its musical and dramatic elements achieve complete unity requires firsthand assessment. Nevertheless, its combination of a commanding central subject, an experienced company and an unapologetically contemporary sound offers an appealing proposition: history not as a distant portrait, but as an encounter with aspiration, responsibility and the human being beneath the crown.
